Africa: Why Economists Get It Wrong. Not so long ago, Africa was being described as the “‘Hopeless Continent’. Recently, though, talk has turned to “‘Africa Rising’, with enthusiastic voices exclaiming the potential for economic growth across many of its countries. What, then, is the truth behind Africa’s growth, or lack of it?

Collier and Gunning (1999) •It is clear that Africa has suffered a chronic failure of economic growth. The problem for analysis is to determine its causes. Collier (2007) •^The central problem of the bottom billion is that they have not grown. The failure of the growth process in these societies simply has to be our core concern

When economists finally began looking at history in the late 1990s, they continued ignoring growth, searching instead for the variable that could explain Africa’s chronic failures. Scholars argued that poor education, aid dependency, the slave trade or colonialisms caused the slow growth in the 20 th century, when in fact these phenomena were also correlated with high growth at various periods.

Development economics as a field of study was formally launched in the 1950s by the Afro-Caribbean economist Arthur Lewis who, out of necessity, wanted to understand how his own country, Saint Lucia, could transform from an agro-based economy into a modern industrial state (later, in 1979, Lewis was awarded the Nobel Memorial Prize in Economics for this work, the only black person to have won the prize to date). For Lewis, the key to providing a satisfactory answer to the problem of ...

Macroeconomists working on Africa have got their analysis very wrong, argues Morten Jerven. In his new book, Africa: Why Economists get it wrong, Jerven argues that the study of Africa relies on flawed narratives and data. He questions many of the presuppositions made by popular economists to provide a revisionist account of African economic history.

Africa: Why Economists Get It Wrong, Jerven

Electricity is available only to 30% of African households and business. This is a great impediment to real growth. The original economist articles were right. Africa is not doing well economically. Africa needs to modernize agriculture and generate more electricity. Otherwise, prosperity in the style of the “Asian Tigers” will be elusive.

Whilst for the past two decades experts have focused on explaining why there has been a ‘chronic failure of growth’ in Africa, Jerven shows that most African economies have been growing at a rapid pace since the mid nineties. In addition, African economies grew rapidly in the fifties, the sixties, and even into the seventies.
