Amazon.com: Dostoevsky and Christian Tradition (Cambridge:--

The one basic choice placed before modern man is that between the man-god of the atheists and the God-man of Christian revelation. Dostoevsky had faced that choice himself and made it in favor of Christ and the faith of the Church. He saw the same choice placed before every man. Many atheists pass across the pages of Dostoevsky's novels.

The Christian Response to Atheism: Dostoevsky

Dostoevsky had a gift, virtually unique among modern writers, for making Christianity dynamic, for subtly forcing the ideological challenges of the modern age to interact dialogically with his Christian vision and for embodying this vision in psychologically compelling characters.

Introduction: Reading Dostoevsky religiously – Dostoevsky:--

Dostoevsky was an Orthodox Christian who was raised in a religious family and knew the Gospel from a very young age. He was influenced by the Russian translation of Johannes Hübner's One Hundred and Four Sacred Stories from the Old and New Testaments Selected for Children (partly a German bible for children and partly a catechism ).

Dostoevsky's personal credo, his tumultuous assent to the Christian dogmatic tradition, gave rise to the architectonics of his novels. His uses of Christian symbology are usually far less obvious or systematic than are many other religious writers, like Dante, for example.

Dostoevsky and the Doctrinal Imagination – Transpositions

Chateaubriand and Dostoevsky incarnated their defense of Christianity through their women characters, Atala and Amelia in Chateaubriand's stories Atala and Rene, and Sonia in Dostoevsky's novel Crime and Punishment embody the Christian faith. Chateaubriand and Dostoevsky's symbolization of women as redemptive figures can be explained partially because women played a major role in their own conversion to Christianity.
