Inflammatory arthritis represents a group of diseases which includes rheumatoid arthritis, peripheral & axial spondyloarthritis and psoriatic arthritis. These diseases are characterised by dysfunction of the immune system, and inflammation within joints, tendons or ligaments. There is a need to improve the healthcare of people with inflammatory arthritis, particularly reducing delays in recognition and referral.

Consider inflammatory arthritis in anyone with acute or subacute onset of joint pain, early morning stiffness, and soft tissue swelling. Early diagnosis and treatment with disease modifying anti-rheumatic drugs (DMARDs) and corticosteroids improves function and symptomatic and radiographic outcomes. Patients need rapid access to specialist advice during flares.

Once a joint is damaged, the damage cannot be reversed. Early treatment aimed at reducing inflammation is important to prevent damage to the joint and, for some forms of inflammatory arthritis, to internal organs. Inflammatory arthritis is often referred to as being systemic because it can affect the whole body. The most common forms of inflammatory arthritis are: rheumatoid arthritis (RA), ankylosing spondylitis and psoriatic arthritis. Inflammatory arthritis also affects children.

There is no specific diagnostic test for rheumatoid arthritis (RA), the diagnosis is clinical. Refer all people suspected of having RA for specialist assessment. Offer to carry out a blood test for rheumatoid factor — this is present in 60–70% of people with RA. Consider measuring anti-cyclic citrullinated peptide (anti-CCP) antibodies in people if they are negative for rheumatoid factor — these are found in about 80% of people with RA.
