Latent defects are defects which are not apparent or readily detectable until years after a project is completed, when the defects liability period is over. Latent defects are concealed flaws; defects which do exist but are hidden in some way. The 'normal' defects which are detected during the construction phase are known as patent defects.

~~Latent defects in construction - Everything you need to know~~

It is the nature of construction projects that faults and defects caused by failures in design, workmanship or materials, may not become apparent or readily detectable (even with the exercise of reasonable care) until many years after completion of the project, long after the end of the defects liability period. Such defects are known as latent defects (as opposed to patent defects which are apparent).
