The theory behind the starvation treatment is that fat stored in the pancreas interferes with insulin production. Studies in mice and humans have shown that fat in the pancreas can damage beta cell function and the cells themselves. Lead researcher Roy Taylor, MD, said that "the very low-calorie diet reduced the amount of fat in the pancreas and liver, which allowed insulin production and function to return to normal."

Starvation can reverse type 2 diabetes. A new study shows that starvation (eating 600 kcal/day) can reverse type 2-diabetes, just like gastric bypass surgery. Again, there is no need to explain the effect of the surgery with other speculative theories. The resulting starvation reverses diabetes.

In a manner very similar to diabetic ketoacidosis, a lack of insulin is to blame in the case of prolonged starvation; however the difference is that the mechanisms of insulin secretion are intact, and some low baseline insulin level remains. Starvation results in decreased insulin and thus in increased lipolysis; the resulting increase in the delivery of free fatty acids to the liver exceeds the capacity of acetyl-CoA to enter the Krebs cycle, and ketogenesis results.

Treatment for malnutrition (undernutrition) depends on the underlying cause and how malnourished a person is. You may be given advice to follow at home, or be supported at home by a dietitian or other qualified healthcare professional. In severe cases, treatment in hospital may be needed. The healthcare professional in charge of your care must ask for your consent when starting or stopping nutrition support.

(1) It is not dangerous to starve a diabetic, and two or three days of starvation almost always make a patient sugar-free, thus saving a good deal of time, as contrasted with the old treatment of gradually cutting down the carbohydrate.
